Venezuela Crash

CARACAS—Investigators probing the crash of a Pan American World Airways jetliner said they were considering the possibility of sabotage because the plane's pilot had reported everything was "fine" when he radioed for permission to begin his landing approach.

All 50 persons aboard the plane, en route from New York, were killed when it exploded and fell into the sea in flames, 10 miles off the Venezuelan coast. Twenty-three bodies have been recovered, some mutilated by sharks.
